

Controlling population

I agree with a recent letter writer that the proposed Nipomo pipeline is a good short-term solution to the pending water shortage.

However, the long-term problem is not a water shortage, but excess population.

The long-term solution is to limit population. There is no benefit to an ever-increasing population, while there are significant costs, as demonstrated by the Nipomo situation.

All of us can do our part in limiting future population growth by having two children or fewer.
